Gulbenkian Prize for Humanity

The €1 million Gulbenkian Prize for Humanity helps accelerate proven, impactful climate action that benefits people and the planet.

Winners are selected by an independent jury of internationally recognised experts in climate science and earth systems; climate justice and human rights; innovation and technology; and diplomacy, governance and politics, chaired by Angela Merkel, through a rigorous process including open nominations.

Any individual, organisation or group of individuals/organisations making a significant contribution to tackling climate change for people and the planet can receive the Prize. They can come from anywhere in the globe.

Winners are chosen for their proven achievements and inspirational leadership, as well as their potential for wider transformative impact, and relevance to the most pressing challenges posed by climate change to people and the planet.

The nomination form asks five open text questions to help the Jury assess the nominee against the key criteria.
